

True story:

“GOD AT WORK”

Columbia, South America

This is a story of a missionary family that experienced “God-At-Work” ...it took place in Columbia, South America.

A missionary family went to a nearby town to stock up on supplies. After they finished shopping and were in the car leaving town, they observed well-armed rebels ahead of them at the end of the street. And when the family looked back, insurgents were also coming towards them from the rear. The family realized they were blocked in, and believed they were in danger.

As the family was frantically trying to figure out what to do, they discovered a street that led them out of town. This street also turned out to be a shortcut to their home. The family was so relieved and wondered why they had never seen that shortcut before!

It was decided that the next time the family went for supplies, they would take that shortcut road! Sure enough, when they needed to go again for supplies, the family went to the area where they had traveled the shortcut road. They looked and looked for that road; however, never located it...people in the area told them there had never been a road there! They were shocked!

The missionary family’s escape that day was a “God-At-Work” experience...He had provided a way!

Questions:

- How do you think the missionaries felt when they realized what God had done to protect them?
- What does this say about God?
- What does this say about you?
